

A few years ago in Britain, it was illegal to sell certain items on Sundays. Goods which were timely or perishable in some way (such as newspapers and fresh fruit) could be sold. However, goods which did not become less useful over short periods time (such as books and home improvement equipment) could not.

How did hardware stores get around the law?

